ATPE Urges Texas Governor to Allow Schools to Determine Their Own Mask Needs

State's largest educator association calls on Gov. Greg Abbott to revoke his prohibition on governmental subdivisions implementing mask rules

AUSTIN—In light of increased COVID-19 cases stemming from the Delta variant and new health recommendations, the Association of Texas Professional Educators (ATPE)—the largest association for Texas educators—calls on Gov. Greg Abbott to revoke his executive order prohibiting local government entities from implementing their own mask mandates and give school districts the authority to decide what they deem to be right for their own schools.

On Tuesday, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) shared new recommendations that everyone, even those who have been vaccinated, wear face masks in K-12 schools, where the vast majority of school age children ages 12 and under have not yet been granted approval for the COVID-19 vaccine.

"From the very beginning of the COVID-19 pandemic, ATPE has called for state leaders to empower school districts and local health officials to do what is best for their communities," said Shannon Holmes, ATPE Executive Director. "In light of the CDC recommendations, ATPE is urging Gov. Abbott, to give them the authority do what is right for them, whatever that may be."

According to the CDC, the Delta variant could be spread through "breakthrough" cases among vaccinated people. Masks are considered an important step to helping "... prevent people from getting and spreading COVID-19. They provide a barrier that keeps respiratory droplets from spreading."

"We all want to return to normal as soon as possible," said Holmes. "Giving local school leaders the ability to implement safety precautions that are suitable for their communities and local conditions will help prevent further spread of the disease and longer-term restrictions."
